WILDERNESS IS OUR COMMON GROUND

My shop in old town Pocatello and small businesses like mine across the state rely on local outdoor enthusiasts as well as tourists who are drawn to Idaho by its vast open spaces. From hiking and camping in the summer to skiing and snowshoeing in the winter, Idaho's wilderness provides endless choices for recreation and outdoor activities. I also enjoy dirt bike riding and snowmobiling, and there are plenty of places around here to do that. But we also need wilderness like Castle Peak and the Boulder Chain Lakes where we can find quiet and escape the roar of engines.

Untouched places like the Boulder-White Cloud Mountains are Idaho at its best. They provide clear flowing water for many of our rivers, and help drive the billion dollar outdoor recreation industry in Idaho. As businessmen, outdoor enthusiasts and most importantly as Idahoans, we need to work together to protect pristine open spaces like the Boulder-White Clouds. Because wilderness is about more than just protecting Idaho's special places—it's about creating possibilities for everyone.
